of sent it rolled inside a cake. But "seven out of 10 times you run into the same person's resume within 48 hours", Mr. Atwater noted. Americans have always believed in trumpeting their own virtues, especially on jobs and qualifications. Many are now orchestrating entire symphonies of support, seeking sponsors, senators references and string-pullers to endorse their applications or to place their folders discreetly on the top of the pile. That pile has already reached alpine proportions. Applications flow in at the rate of 2,000 a week. The conservative Heritage Foundation, a think-tank that has seen its influence wane as the zealous have left the Reagan Administration, has gone for the big bang approach—endorsing any one who has a hope of keeping the conservative flame alight, and sending in a lot of resumes last January.

all parts of America, with ever more fanciful applications in- side. One man sent in a leather folder with his name embossed in gold on the outside. Some people include a copy of everything they have ever written. Some adopt a 12-years-of-Christmas approach—sending, like the ardent supporter, dozens of similar applications, repeated day after day. One woman sent in 100 on her- self, each with a different cover- ing letter for a different job. Others, taking a more content- porary line, fax over urgent preliminary warnings that their full application is to arrive by express mail the next day. Each insists that he or she is uniquely qualified because of his or her long-time support for George Bush (and even Dan Quayle, whose name is also liberally spattered in most applications). This was cited by the teenager who picked up a Bush press aide at an airport
