

Out of cloisters

You have pointed out in your editorial "Out of cloisters" that we could not make optimum use of the skills we possess. It is for this reason that our well-established institutions have produced more theoretical experts than "field experts". The applied biasness of scientific knowledge and skills for the field has not been infused in our youthful mind through these institutions.

As we want to transform our land from the so-called "international basket case" into "Shonar Bangla" it is imperative that the sooner we produce "field experts" the better for making the nation great.

You have also emphasised for swift reorientation of our educational systems. Since the British left the country in 1947 we have talked more about it than taking any pragmatic action. The reorientation should be done in a way that we learn to put the high value on doing things by ourself than depending on others.

In other words, the dignity of labour has to be exemplified by the white collared personnel in the upper echelon of the organisations. The dreams of promised land can only be fulfilled if all of us can put every ounce of our energy for the developmental work. Instead of sitting on the problems we should keep on going by utilising to the maximum the skills that are in our possession.
